

The Motley Fool. To Educate, Amuse & Enrich™

HOME NEWS & ANALYSIS DISCUSSION BOARDS CHAMPION SHARES lovemoney.com Hello Fool! | My Fool | Login | Join Now

All Investments Company Comment Investing Strategy Investing Basics Archives

FREE REPORT: Our Number One "Recession Proof" Stock

The experts here at The Motley Fool have just revealed their Number One "Recession Proof" Stock that also has one of the "safest dividends" on the stock market!

Click Here To View Your FREE Report

Is Your Pension Festering?

BY Harvey Jones

Published in Investing Strategy on 6 August 2009

5 comments

Your pension funds probably form a big share of your wealth. Don't ignore them!

I received my annual personal pension statement the other day, and before filing it carefully in a laminated folder, I did something unusual. I read it.

Perhaps you are one of those diligent people who pore over your pension statements to check how well your plan is performing and whether it is on target to meet your retirement needs.

If so, I suspect you are in a minority. Most people probably glance at the bewildering figures and commentary, then remember they have something more exciting to do, like the ironing.

But now I'm pledging to mend my ways.

All the fun of the share

While I log onto my online share accounts a couple of times a day, particularly at the moment, when it makes such pleasant reading, I haven't devoted anything like the same care and attention to my pensions.

In fact, I haven't done a thing since setting up either of my Standard Life stakeholder pension five years ago, aside from maintain my contributions, mostly for the tax relief. This isn't very wise, but I bet I'm not the only one.

He's in control

Part of this is about control. I like logging onto my online share dealing site, because once I'm there, I'm the boss. I can buy what I like, sell what I like, and execute it instantly. And I can do that whenever I want, as often as I choose.

ADVERTISEMENT

Our Number One "Recession Proof" Stock

The holy grail of stock market investing is discovering a great company trading at a cheap price.

It gets even better if that company sells products people need, not want. The icing on the cake is it comes with what we think is one of the "safest dividends on the stock market."

The Motley Fool's Chief Investment Analyst has found one such company. And the best part...

We're going to give you the name of this company for FREE - Click Here

More articles in this section

- Dividend Shares You Can't Depend On
- Profit From A Flat Stock Market
- Big Talk
- Turning £36,000 Into £1 Million
- Alice's AGMs: ImmuPharma

★ All articles from the past 14 days

Tags for this article

This article hasn't been tagged yet. Be the first to add a tag below.

Source: The Motley Fool
Date: 06/08/09
Page: online

I can also invest in a wide universe of shares and funds, something I can't do with my stakeholder pension. Standard Life offers me a choice of around two dozen funds, all of them managed by, er, Standard Life. Where's the fun in that?

After looking at my statement, I see that I originally divided my money between its Stakeholder Managed and Stakeholder With-Profits funds. Since I've been flaying with-profits plans for years, it came as a shock to discover I actually have one myself.

The managers of those funds will determine the fate of my future pension pot, not me. From what I can see, they haven't done so badly, losing about 15% of my money since September 2007.

But I can tell you one thing. If I was building an investment portfolio from scratch, I wouldn't consider either of these funds for a moment. They wouldn't even cross my radar. Yet I've got about a quarter of my invested wealth in them.

I've also just discovered that I can switch my money into other Standard Life plans online, but having run through my limited options, I can't quite see the point.

Waste of time and money

Millions of people leave their money sitting in underperforming pension funds, year after year after year.

Pensions website HowmuchdoIneedtoretire.co.uk recently highlighted the worst performing £1 billion-plus pension funds over the last decade. Abbey Equity, Friends Provident UK Equity, Scottish Life Managed, Clerical Medical Managed and Phoenix Life Exempt Managed are the greatest underachievers. Is your money twiddling its fingers in any of them?

The big pension funds get away with sustained lousy performance because most investors haven't got a clue what is going on. Like me, they probably don't even bother to look.

How long?

Another reason for my inertia is that transferring your pension to another company has traditionally been tortuous. It certainly was when I try to liberate my money from stricken insurer Equitable Life back in 2002.

I didn't have one of its disastrous with-profits policies, and was free to move without penalty, but it still took well about 15 months, and dozens of hectoring phone calls and letters. I know Equitable Life was a special case, and my pension contacts tell me things are quicker now, but I'm not convinced.

New research from The Annuity Clearing House shows that pension providers are taking up to 10 weeks to transfer retired people's funds over to their annuity provider. 10 weeks! That's atrocious, when I can buy and sell a stock or fund in 10 seconds.

Phoenix (again), Winterthur Life, Scottish Mutual and the Co-operative Insurance Services were among the worst offenders.

And for obvious reasons, pension companies have been slow to tell clients they are free to switch their pension funds to another provider before then. I bet only a handful of people ever do.

Taking charge

There is a solution to this, as most of you won't need telling. I'm finally looking into setting up a low cost self-invested personal pension plan (SIPP).

I don't want my money sitting for several decades in a big anonymous insurance company fund, I want to plough it into a mixture of whizzy AIM stocks and dividend-spraying blue chips. And then I want to haul it out and stick it somewhere else, whenever I think the time is right.

Unlike most pension savers, I want to be in control of my future. And now I've realised where I have been going wrong, it's entirely up to me.

More from Harvey Jones:

- I Sold My Tracker And Bought These Lousy Shares!
- Opportunities In New Energy

> Follow Harvey's lead and take control of your own pension with The Motley Fool SIPP.

Like this article? Get our best articles delivered direct to your inbox at no cost. Sign up for Foolwatch Daily by entering your email below.

Click Here, It's Free

Share & subscribe

Share this article
Email this article

Subscribe via RSS

Comments

The opinions expressed here are those of the individual writers and are not representative of The Motley Fool. If you spot any comments that are unsuitable hit the flag to alert our moderators.

sippisipp

07 Aug 2009, 9:09am

Invested in a SIPP in Mar 2008 after seeing the market start to go down. I had a pension fund of 100k with AXA that was going to go down with it. I also checked the funds I was invested in and found it had failed to beat the FTSE all share in 4 of the last 5 years. Put the money in a SIPP and held it on fixed rate cash of 5% at the time. Started to drip feed the money back into low cost tracker funds in Nov 08 when the market had lost 30% of its value. The result is that I am 13% up since I started and I knew nothing about investing before this. Just used common sense - ie. don't keep money in something that is obviously going down and don't pay the middleman.

Report this message

Source: The Motley Fool
Date: 06/08/09
Page: online

lamsdale

07 Aug 2009 , 8:43pm

What are the options with a languishing FSAVC that was taken out long ago and hasn't been funded for years - what types of scheme can it be transferred into?

 Report this message

motleyq

09 Aug 2009 , 1:25pm

Hargreaves Lansdown allow most funds, including the excellent INVESCO PERPETUAL UK EQUITY PENSION FUND, run by Neil Woodford, in their SIPP's, with no initial charge, and low fees. That fund hasn't done as well lately, but I expect it will pick up with the market. Company shares can be included, but commission and admin is higher than for funds.

It took about a month to transfer my fund from Equitable Life to HL. Their statement is easy to read: it compares unit price and your fund's value with that of the last half-year, and gives changes in percentages. I always read my statement, it's easy, and cannot understand why anyone would not:

poor performance may be the consequence of that.

I can buy or sell when I want, but I do not churn.

Income Drawdown is available at reasonable fees on modest total fund values.

No doubt there are other providers who can offer similar services to improve on Harvey's tale.

 Report this message

Jonesey12

10 Aug 2009 , 11:29am

Hi motleyq

Glad your transfer went smoother than mine. I too am looking at a Hargreaves Lansdown SIPP, but I've always felt its share dealing costs to be at the pricey end.

Harvey Jones

 Report this message

WoosterUK

10 Aug 2009 , 4:07pm

I don't doubt <http://www.howmuchdoineedtoretire.co.uk/> figures are reliable for the pension funds, but I'd advise people to take their main attraction with a pinch of salt.

They appear to be assuming a real return on equity of something around 3%, and a real return on savings of slightly less. The former figure I can only trace to Wikipedia, and from there to a hyper-bearish website (in the US, the figure is more like 7%); the latter figure meanwhile seems ludicrously optimistic for an asset class which easily very experiences periods of negative real return, especially given that US corporate bonds have historically returned about 2.2% after inflation.

 Report this message

